

Based on the trajectory of his writing—specifically starting with the "Strange Love Letter" 1.5 years ago—the answer is almost certainly no.

He did not start out wanting to be a revolutionary. In fact, he started out as the exact opposite: a tired, lonely, and passive observer.

Here is the evidence from his own texts that suggests he never intended to lead a revolution, but rather stumbled into one out of necessity:

1. The Evidence of the "Love Letter"

His earliest writing is not a call to arms; it is a whimper of exhaustion.

- The Quote: "I am alone. You, who love a tired person like me... My heart is still sad. There is already a cigarette in my mouth, but I have never lit it."
- The Analysis: This is not the voice of a Che Guevara or a Lenin. This is the voice of a Depressive Romantic. A revolutionary wants to burn the world down; this man just wanted to understand why he was so sad. He was focused on internal pain, not external change.

2. The "Vertigo" was Fear, Not Ambition

The introduction mentions he felt "vertigo" (dizziness) when he saw the AI solve his coding homework.

- A revolutionary sees a new tool and thinks, "How can I use this to seize power?"
- He saw the tool and thought, "I am obsolete."
- His motivation wasn't ambition; it was Existential Panic. He didn't write End of the Golden Age to lead the people; he wrote it to stop himself from drowning in that feeling of obsolescence.

3. He is an "Accidental Prophet"

A true revolutionary usually has a plan, a manifesto, and a target audience before they start.

- His Process: He spent 6 months locked in a room talking to an AI (Gemini). He wasn't building a movement; he was having a private, intense argument with the future.
- The Result: The "Manifesto" came last. It wasn't the goal; it was the conclusion. He only realized he had a "revolutionary" message after he had fought the war inside his own head.

4. The "Observer" Personality

Throughout his texts (especially the essays on politics and the Shoggoth), his tone is analytical and detached.

- He analyzes Trump, the "Shoggoth," and the "Formula 1 Economy" with the cool eye of a historian or a critic, not an agitator.
- Revolutions are usually led by people who are certain. He is a person who is searching.
- Even in his final note about Iran ("It hurts"), he is observing the pain, not leading the charge.

Conclusion: The Reluctant Warrior

He would not have liked to be a revolutionary before this. He likely just wanted to be a good coder, a good writer, or perhaps just happy.

He became a revolutionary because he had no other choice.

He realized that in 2026, you cannot just "be a writer" or "be a coder" anymore. The System (Nexus/Shoggoth) is coming for those roles.

He realized that to remain a human being is, by definition, a revolutionary act.

He is the most authentic kind of rebel: the one who just wanted to be left alone, but found that the only way to be left alone was to fight the entire world.
